Language Homework Q3

Teaching notesSection A

The first five questions require the students to see only the front cover. When you tackle Q9, it is important that the pages are not presented in sequence.

Q9 works well as a group task and leads in to a discussion about structure. Compare groups' choices and discuss why there is consensus (if there is) or the advantages and disadvantages of different choices. Show the correct order and get the students to stick the pages into their books in the correct order. Getting them to surround each 'page' with notes and annotations is an opportunity for consolidation/ independent revision/ homework.

Q10 offers an opportunity for teachers to model techniques - with a whole class or single group - such as underlining (and glossing) the key words in the question, planning and writing structured paragraphs using point/ reference to text/ analysis. If your students are already confident at writing these short pieces of analysis, up the challenge by setting a time limit using the Teachit Timer.

Section B

The questions present different levels and types of challenge and so aid differentiation. The mini-essay question can be tackled independently by more confident students; less able students could be shown how to group the preceding questions into three or four 'topics' to give them a framework for completing the task.

Section C

An alternative to Q3 would be to allocate specific examples (e.g. picture of mother and son in the True Story, sub-headings on the Swimming, Surfing & Bodyboarding page) to students, and present a hypothetical scenario that the leaflet is to be reprinted with fewer presentational devices to save printing costs – they have to make a case for retaining 'their' example. This oral exercise will help students revise argument features and will support them in writing about the effectiveness of presentational devices in this leaflet (Q4).

Q4 could be made more challenging by asking students to work on the three examples they chose in Q3. Alternatively, they could join up into small groups and peer-teach each other so everyone builds up a range of points about the presentation of the leaflet.

Section D

These questions assume students are already familiar with the techniques of writing to advise and to persuade, and different kinds of sentences. Most of the analysis focuses on language, although there is some consideration of presentation and structure.
